

I think it is absolutely unconscionable that competition would be thwarted in such a matter, all at the behest of corporations that already control 30-40% of their respective markets in the United States. I believe this service is critical to the continued growth and viability of the young digital radio market.

I respectfully hope the FCC will agree that without being able to provide services that consumers expect from radio broadcasts, Congress's desire for competition among national broadcasters would be seriously harmed.

-Andrew Boehlen